

SANDRINGHAM HOUSE

Most cavalry regiments in the British Army have been in existence, under one name or another, for anything up to 300 years. They have all seen action in various parts of the world and have collected a great many items of historical interest.

The Queen's Royal Hussars (The Queen's Own and Royal Irish), and its antecedent regiments, has accumulated a particularly rich collection of literature and artefacts during their participation in wars, battles, significant actions and garrison activities in many parts of the world. This is the stuff of history and vividly illustrates many of the significant incidents in our national history.

This remarkable collection needs to be exhibited for the benefit of past and present members as well as for their families and friends, and for the public at large. What better place than in this new museum in Warwick. I wish this project every success.